Keep Abreast Of The Law Making Bodies

Forty-four State Legislatures have convened in 1935. A vast amount of legislation has been enacted. This may vary from an unimportant amendment to a radical and vital change.

The business man, the professional man, the laborer and the housewife, look to the lawyer to advise and guide them with respect to their rights as affected by such legislation.

No lawyer or law office, however large or well equipped, can possibly familiarize themselves with this maze of thousands of new laws that will affect so vitally the existing statute law. That is a task which can be performed only by an organization of a different type, an organization devoted exclusively to that purpose.

Shepard's Citations is that organization. From a small beginning, over sixty years ago, it has become an institution, unique in its field.

As each law is enacted, it is studied with painstaking care by especially trained lawyers, correlated and indexed, so that its effect on existing statutes can be shown in Shepard's Citations.

It is like a fine radio receiving and sending apparatus. It brings in from every corner of the country every item of legislation and broadcasts it to those who are seeking it.

No lawyer can afford to be without Shepard's Citations—the last word in tracing the legislative history or case construction of a statute.
