In a similar manner the application of blood grouping to the examination of blood stains is set forth. A defendant may show that the blood found on his clothes was not that of the victim. It is even possible, from the saliva present on the moist end of a cigar, to determine the type of blood of the criminal who left his cigar butt on the scene of the crime.

Those who have doubted the competency of the blood group tests dare not ignore Mr. Vogelhut's powerful arguments in their behalf; those who favor the acceptance of these tests by the courts will find his pamphlet replete with ammunition supporting that view; and those who have no opinion will find his article of great scientific and legal interest.
