Now If A Sued B

A nicely balanced legal conundrum is propounded in the columns of the London Times by a member of the bar. A contracted to instruct B in rhetoric. The arrangement was that B should pay a fee in two installments. The first was to be paid at once. The second was conditional on B's succeeding in his first case: should he lose, then he could consider his instruction poor and the second installment canceled. He paid the first installment and was duly instructed; but failed to practice. A therefore sued him for the balance of the fee.

A argued thus: "If I win this suit, then B must—by judgment—pay me. If I lose it, then he will have won his first suit and will still have to pay me." B however, argued: "If A wins the suit against me, then I shall have lost my first case and need not pay him. If on the other hand, I win the case, then by judgment of the court I need not pay him."

The court has not ruled.
